Introduction of School of Journalism and Communication:

The School of Journalism and Communication at GDUFS was founded in 2005 and emerged out of the International Journalism program offered to students majoring in English. Since the School's establishment, teaching journalism in English has been a major concept. Our goal is to develop into an influential base for teaching and research in international communication throughout the country, particularly in South China. After 10 years of development, we now offer 4 undergraduate majors (Journalism, Advertising, Broadcasting and Hosting, and Internet and New Media) and 2 MA programs in Journalism and Communication, Cultural Communication and Media. We not only have excelled at academic research, but also have provided services to governments and various other organizations. Our 100% employment rate of graduates ranks at the top among China's journalism schools.

Teachers in our school are undertaking 17 projects of national social sciences, over 30 provincial and ministerial research programs, and dozens of programs sponsored by governments, enterprises and institutions. They have published more than 40 monographs, 20 translated books, 10 textbooks and hundreds of high quality papers. The school's staff includes 14 professors and 12 associate professors, 27 doctoral and master tutors, 33 teachers with doctoral degrees, 6 who are pursuing doctor's degrees and 4 full-time foreign teachers. Three-quarters of the teaching staff possess overseas study experience, while 30% have obtained their degrees from abroad, and 40% can conduct all-English instruction. We have established academic exchange and cooperation programs for both undergraduates and postgraduates with over 10 universities in the UK, USA, Australia, Taiwan and Hong Kong.
